Risk tolerance is primarily driven by confidence ($r=0.924$) and composure ($r=0.478$), not wealth or impulsivity. This suggests that financial risk assessment should prioritize psychological profiling over traditional wealth-based metrics.

Wealth is skewed to the right as we would expect to see.

Most people's net worth falls between £200 and £600.

Risk tolerance does not correlate with total wealth, not what we would expect to find.

There is no split in risk tolerance between currency, a person's risk tolerance doesn't have an effect on the currency they choose to hold
